There is some financial assistance available for certain things. And you and your loved one can ask the health care team to consider the cost of care and insurance coverage when making treatment decisions.

Although it is likely hard to think and talk about, having a plan for managing the costs of care is important. Planning will help you be better informed about your loved one’s options. Having a plan may help you feel more in control and less worried about paying for treatment. Get help sooner than later—before the expenses become overwhelming.

GATHER INFORMATION:

When you make treatment decisions, gather as much information as possible about your loved one’s insurance and out-of-pocket costs. Discuss the pros and cons of each treatment option openly with your doctor. Ask for help with gathering information from the following:

- A family member or close friend
- Oncology social worker
- Patient/nurse navigator
- Financial planner
- Your loved one’s insurance provider
- Financial counselor/business office at your doctor’s office or cancer center

HELP IS AVAILABLE

Even with the best health insurance, cancer treatment is expensive. There are out-of-pocket medical costs, including co-insurance, deductibles, co-pays, out-of-network costs, and medications. If your loved one does not have medical insurance, they may be eligible for Medicaid (state) or there may be options for them through your State Health Insurance Marketplace (800-318-2596 or www.healthcare.gov). It can be challenging to manage the cost of medications, as well as rent, food and gas. There are ways to manage these costs and members of your health care team, financial counselors, and non-profit organizations may be able to help you.
